Shane Dundas: Believe
from fall-down to stand-up

Shane Dundas has done a lot of comedy as half of the Umbilical Brothers (for reference, he's the balder half). But there's one thing he's never done: his own solo show. Before, he fell down a lot for your amusement; now he will need to stand-up.

He's travelled the world doing comedy, and now he's going where he's never been. It's a scary proposition, after all this time. Can he do it, without the security of a double act? Is it even possible? What form will it take? This is truly uncharted territory for Shane, and in order to get through it, he's going to have to believe in himself. Or in something. Or at least get the audience to believe he does. Or maybe get them to believe in something else. He's going to look at what rings your bells as well as his. How far will he need to go, to get you to go with him? Top night or train wreck, you'll want to be there when it happens. Can he make you believe?
