Stuck

Stuck in the confined space of an elevator, Philip is confronted with facing his demons, one being claustrophobia. He looks for ways to deal with the situation in a variety of ways. The fear of not ever getting out forces him to find solace in parts of himself he doesn't usually look to. Performed by David Loney in Richmonds intimate theatre space, The Owl and the pussycat, "Stuck" reflects the frustration we all feel when faced with a calamity.

We chose Richmonds theatre space, "The Owl and the Pussycat because the small, intimate stage suits the claustrophobic atmosphere that the main character is experiencing.

It is a very physical piece of theatre, an aspect of live theatre which has been of constant interest to David Loney, having studied at the National theatre drama school, where movement and physical theatre were a major part of the curriculum.

Everybody experiences delays in their days, be it public transport, a doctors appointment, etc. We think the audience will empathize with Philips plight, as he takes us on a rollercoaster ride of his fluctuating emotions.
